Dear Mr White,

I'm Li Hua, one of the students who attended your lecture on how to improve our listening skills. I'm writing to express my heartfelt gratitude for your informative and engaging workshop, which offers me practical tips and strategies.

It is your emphasis on active listening that encourages me to focus not just on words but also on intonation and context, which has significantly improved my understanding of conversations. I now find myself better able to grasp the slight differences in dialogues. To consolidate what I've learned from your session, I will continue to do listening exercise regularly, applying these useful techniques while listening.

Looking forward to attending your fascinating lectures again!

Yours,

Li Hua

第二节（满分 25 分）

One Possible Version

Hearing that, I suddenly became nervous. The word in the math class? But how to spell it? “A-L-G-A-B-R-A.” I murmured in an uncertain voice. “Incorrect,” Ms. Hawking said, seeming regretful. My heart sank. If Nathan gets next word right, he'll win, I thought with my palms sweating. “Nathan, next is ‘judgment’,” continued Ms. Hawking. Hearing the literature word, I nearly fell over backward. Nathan would definitely get it wrong. Standing next to the whiteboard, I was so busy picturing how Nathan made a mistake that I didn't notice he finished his turn. “J-U-D-G-M-E-N-T. Judgment.”

“You spell ‘judgment’ correctly. Congratulations, Nathan!” cheered Ms. Hawking. I staggered back to my seat when I felt a hand seizing my arm. It was Nathan. “You did a really good job.” He smiled and stuck out his hand to shake mine. I was flushed with embarrassment and regret, trying best to hold back my tears. “Sorry, letters are for math too,” I said. Nathan grinned, “Letters are for everything.” He told me if he did not read science fiction, he would not know the literature word “judgment”. Only then did I realize it's time to change my judgment.
